I, Nimphylel Lelien, am summarily fed up with the constant attacks present in these mountains. We have returned scathed on each expedition, and I would like to avoid it. With that in mind, the dangers so far categorized, in order of my concern from greatest to least:

Controlled Territory
The wilderness here is all but wild. An assortment of creatures, ranging from outsiders to increasingly large lizards, own and control much of what we find. Fey that control the frost, demons wielding morganti guarding cave entrances, and wyrms sleeping in their dens have all been scattered through the mountains. I can only assume we have passed through domains unwittingly and would like to avoid stepping on more toes.

Terrain and Weather
I don't think this requires much explanation. Frozen lakes, dark caves riddled with stalactites, crags, rock slides,cave ins, blistering winds and ice. I can only assume avalanches are to come. I will stay stocked with warm gear and rope.

Assorted Dangerous Fauna
In the caves there were insects. Some that would bite, some that would melt our metal, and some that would put us to sleep so the other two could work undisturbed. Slimes proved the most dangerous to me on a personal level. Shadow slimes can eat shit and die, and the bronze ones are downright disgusting. I am grateful for my legs and my ~~shields~~ fellow party members.

Experiments
There are clearly some inexperienced or disrespectful researchers who did not see fit to prepare their experiments for anyone within near vicinity. Tread carefully.

Beasts out of Control
In some of our survey research we found that many beasts have been restless. Not only hyenas, but yaks have attacked us on the road. That is not a spelling mistake. I hope my scouts are on the lookout for a cause.

That is all.